

9480 Enterprise Drive, Suite 1
Mokena, IL 60448-8690
tel 708.479.7755
fax 708.479.7766
web www.tcmccabe.com

April 2, 2020

To: McCabe Clients

We hope that you, your family and your loved ones are staying safe. Continuing with our increased communications during this difficult time, we wanted to keep you informed and let you know our expectations for this quarter and prepare you for some news headlines this month. As a reminder, we have a team of seasoned investment professionals working relentlessly for you.

After climbing to record highs in February, the S&P 500 ended the first quarter down -19.60% (including dividends), which was its worst quarter since the financial crisis. There is a silver lining, though—it could have been much worse. The index rallied 17.6% in just three days near the end of March on news and hopes for both monetary and fiscal stimulus. This was the strongest three-day rally since 1933. Unfortunately, the rally was led by defensive sectors like utilities, real estate, and health care. These are not the sectors that typically lead in a bull market.

While we welcome the huge stimulus package and the Federal Reserve's responses to the crisis, there is still a lot of uncertainty remaining. Investors discounted risk assets like stocks and high-yield bonds for much of this uncertainty already, but we still won't have a good gauge on the magnitude and length of the economic downturn until we get a handle on the duration of the social distancing policies. To get more clarity on that, we must see the spread of COVID-19 slow.

Unfortunately, large stock market fluctuations are likely to persist and setting our expectations is very important. We are just starting to get a glimpse of the economic data that will be coming. Unemployment numbers will jump and both manufacturing and service-sector data will fall, but just how much will start to become clearer this quarter. No doubt it will be horrible, as markets have already priced in a lot of bad news. The important questions are: how bad will it be, and how long will it last?

We do expect that the second quarter will be the low point for the economy, and we will start to see a recovery in the second half of the year. There will be many negative economic headlines in the coming weeks. A surge of COVID-19 cases is also widely expected.

As April unfolds, we must remind ourselves that much of what we are witnessing is largely priced into markets. In other words, it is expected. While the media will undoubtedly and rightfully focus on this news, we must look beyond the current headlines and to the future. China is showing signs of recovery already, and low interest rates and stimulus should jumpstart the economy when social distancing ends. We should not underestimate the power of these two forces, as we saw the impact these had on markets in 2009. The stimulus package this time around is more than double that of 2008.

We will continue to monitor both news about the virus and the market implications of the economic data, and will keep you informed. If you have any questions whatsoever, please do not hesitate to contact us.

The views stated in this piece are not necessarily the opinion of the broker-dealer and should not be construed directly or indirectly as an offer to buy or sell any securities mentioned herein. Due to volatility within the markets mentioned, opinions are subject to change without notice. Information is based on sources believed to be reliable; however, their accuracy or completeness cannot be guaranteed. Past performance does not guarantee future results. Investors cannot invest directly in indexes. The performance of any index is not indicative of the performance of any investment and does not take into account the effects of inflation and fees and expenses associated with investing. The S&P 500 is a capitalization-weighted index of 500 stocks designed to measure performance of the broad domestic economy through changes in the aggregate market value of 500 stocks representing all major industries.